Monthly Commentary

August was a strong month for the Fund, which rose 12.5%, recovering well from the weakness seen in July. The US dollar index fell for a second consecutive month, having been in decline since late July. Dollar weakness provided a significant tailwind for precious metals and commodities, with the broad commodity complex rising by more than 7%. Safe-haven assets consequently returned to favour. Gold found support around the $4,000 level before rebounding 9.64%, while silver outperformed, rising 15.35%. Copper also advanced modestly, having remained technically strong for some time and holding above both its 50- and 200-day moving averages. Equity markets recovered as economic resilience and robust corporate earnings outweighed lingering concerns over the sustainability of the AI-led rally. Investors appeared willing to set aside valuation concerns as leading technology companies continued to report strong results. Energy markets were more volatile, initially moving lower before spiking later in the month amid renewed US-Iran geopolitical tensions. Long-term US Treasury yields reached multi-month highs, an increasingly important concern given that asset prices are ultimately valued against the cost of money. Notably, higher yields failed to provide support for the dollar, creating an unusual and potentially fragile market environment. At Jackson Hole, Fed Chair Warsh highlighted his concerns over persistent inflation, reinforcing the tension between inflation risks and the pressure to ease monetary policy. US Treasury Secretary Bessent also announced a substantial increase in government debt repurchases, signalling the administration's desire to contain rising yields. With the US Treasury market exceeding $30 trillion, however, meaningful intervention would require considerable financial resources. Against this backdrop, we continue to favour hard assets as a counterweight to the risks associated with further monetary and fiscal expansion.
