Monthly Commentary

October is known as a difficult month and there were certainly plenty of tricks and very few treats in the month this time around. Inflation worries, continued policy uncertainty in the Middle East, interest rate hike concerns, alongside disappointing earnings from top tech companies - all unsettled investors. Questions about how long AI can underpin markets were also raised. For the fund, commodity-related equities reacted to different supply and demand dynamics, with precious metals, industrial metals and agricultural stocks following distinct paths. Base metal mining shares struggled as weaker metals prices and uncertainty over Chinese demand weighed on sentiment. Copper miners were pressured, despite the longer-term structural case for the metal remaining intact. Higher project financing costs and a more cautious appetite for cyclical investments overshadowed any supply constraints i.e. the growing focus on electrification, grid infrastructure, data-centre development, and demand dynamics. Precious metal miners dropped 12.2% but filled a gap on the charts, which we view as both a positive medium to long-term development and an opportunity. Pharmaceuticals benefitted from market rotation as investors bought for the sector's defensive earnings, resilient demand and positive developments in drug research and development. This provided a welcome counterbalance to weakness in technology, where concerns over capital expenditure and the time required to generate adequate returns prompted a reassessment of valuations. The broader market demonstrated greater resilience, with value stocks and smaller companies outperforming large-cap growth. Looking ahead, the S&P 500 has averaged 2.3% gains in November for the last 29 years, and is the best performing month, with even higher gain in Novembers that fall during midterm election years. The current dips provide plentiful food for thought.
